As more children are being identified as autistic, many adults are also realising that being autistic may make a lot of sense of their life experiences and struggles.

Autistic people (especially growing up without knowledge of being autistic) are very vulnerable to Social Anxiety, Depression, Low Self-Esteem etc, and the suicide rate among autistic people is much higher than in the general population.

When they seek therapy, allowance needs to be made for their autistic personality & perspective.

These workshops will present a primarily Person-Centred, Cognitive-Behavioural and Evolution-Informed approach to this challenge, with time for discussion & questions, looking at:

- Current thinking about autism, especially the neurodiversity perspective
- Autistic differences in social information-processing
- Realistic therapy goals, & other relevant issues
- The value of structure in the therapy process
- Therapeutic Approaches to Anxiety, Low Self-Esteem etc
- Further learning resources

Eoin Stephens is a counsellor & trainer who has worked in the area of mental health for over 30 years, particularly focusing on issues such as social anxiety & behavioural addictions. He was awarded the IACP Carl Berkeley Award in 2010.

He is currently focusing attention on understanding the problems faced by autistic adults & their specific therapeutic needs, and is himself autistic, having made the discovery in late adulthood.
